

A show of hands rates The Bee Gees tops

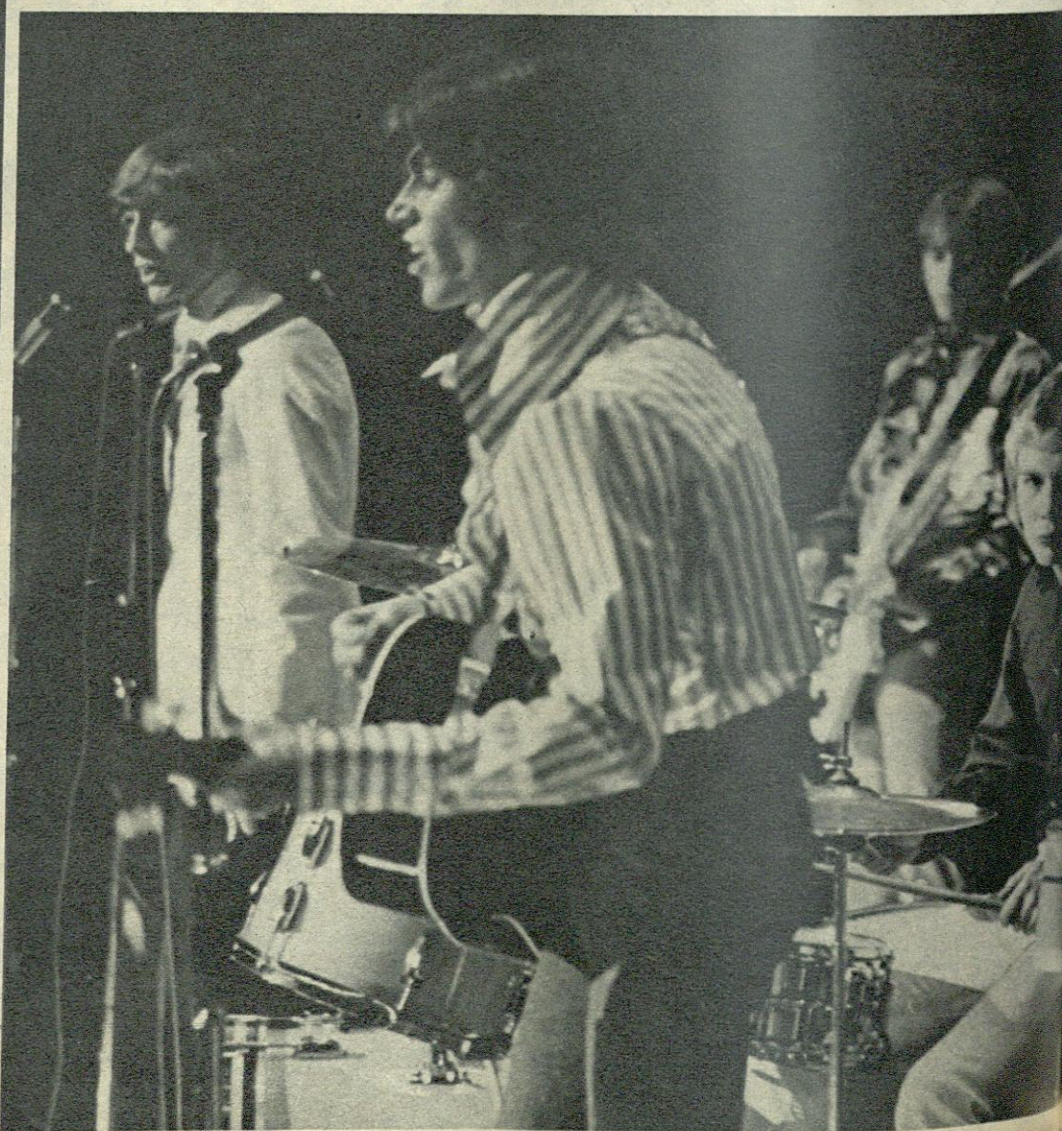

A convincing display from Vince on guitar

Maurice, with frills on!

A soulful Robin sings Massachusetts

The day The Bee Gees come to your town is a fabulous, fantastic, unforgettable one if you happen to be one of The Bee Gees' uncountable number of fans. If you saw The Bee Gees on their recent tour, here's a souvenir for you, which we hope you enjoy. And if you weren't lucky enough to see them this time, we hope these pictures will give you a taste of what happens when The Bee Gees come to your town for an evening.

BY JUNE SOUTHWORTH

THEY come by land, sea and air (well, sometimes!) and for an evening The Bee Gees are yours. They may not come into your home, and they may not even have seen the street where you live, but you're the host for the evening just as surely as if you had all The Bee Gees sitting around your table.

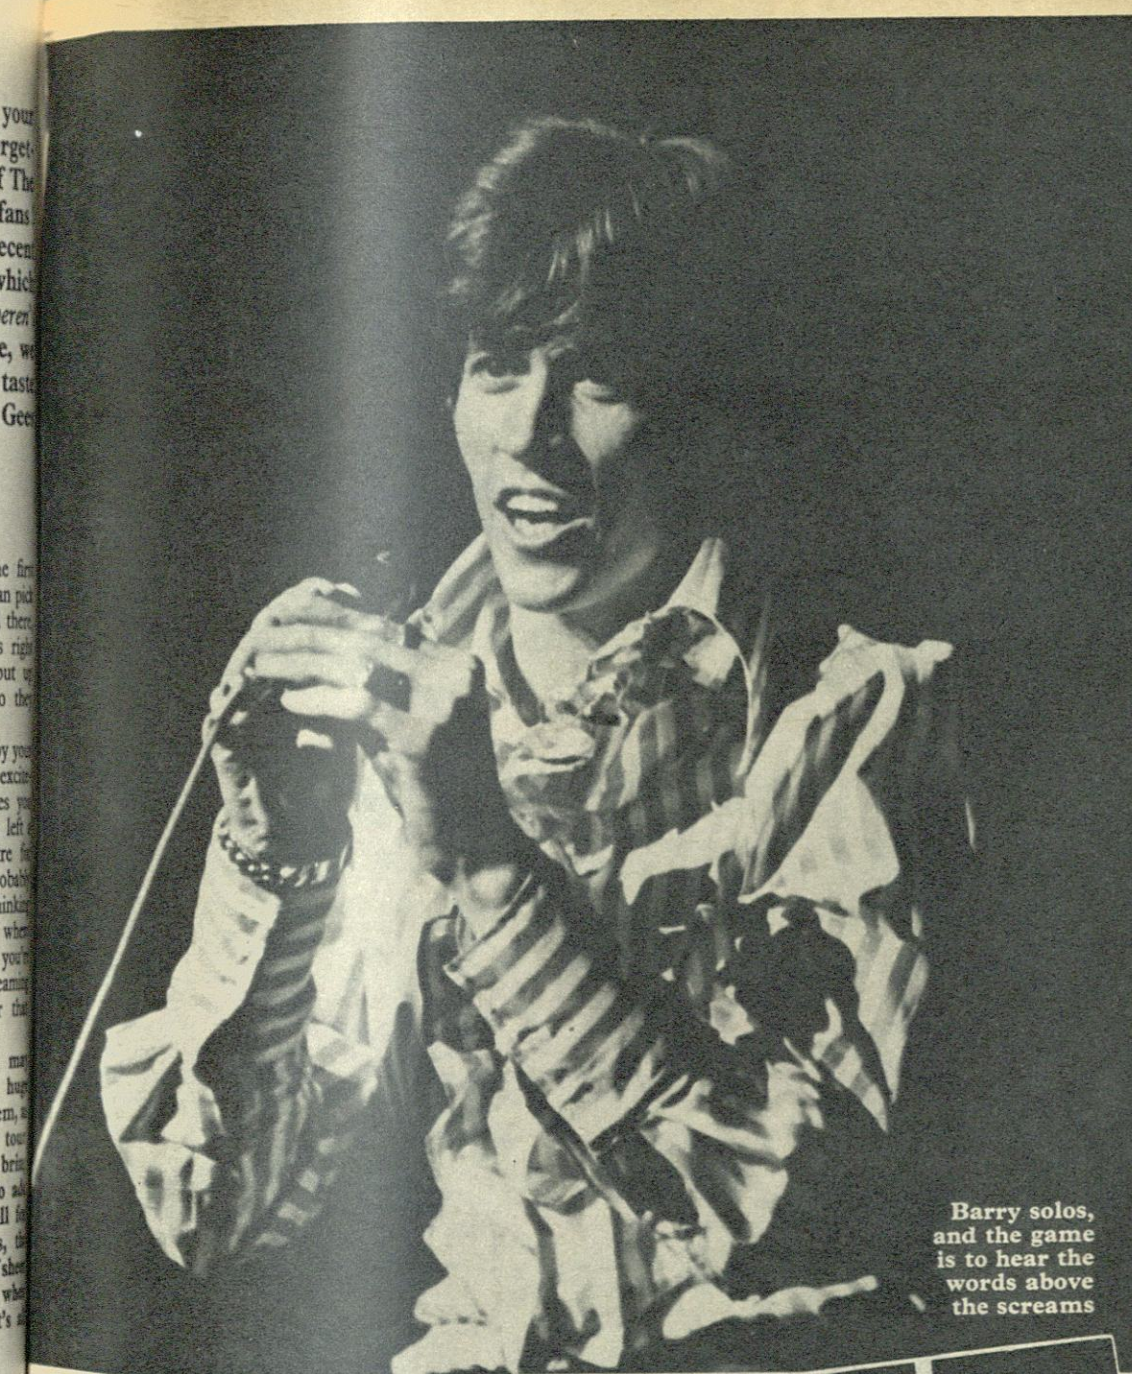

When they come into your town, they often see it through car windows between a flurry of faces and waving arms, and when they reach the theatre they never quite know what to expect—even though you may know every inch of that theatre. So you really are at home to them.

It's when they step into the spotlight for the first time that The Bee Gees meet you. At first all they can see is a dark moving mass, but after the first few minutes they can pick out a face here and there, and if the place is right they might even put up the house lights so they can see you all.

They know you by your screams, by your excitement, by the names you call. And if you've left a letter at the theatre for them, they've probably read it and are thinking of you, wondering where you're sitting and if you're the one who's screaming their names louder than everyone else.

The Bee Gees may have brought a big orchestra with them, as they did on their tour. They may even bring an R.A.F. band to add excitement. It's all for you. All the fuss, the bother, the hour of sleep, the hard work. And when you love them, it's worth it.

Barry solos, and the game is to hear the words above the screams

Barry is obviously singing the words you want to hear!

Singing is such an effort sometimes!

BEE
GEES
VISIT
YOUR TOWN

A stage setting for the fabulous Bee Gees

Once more, all together, girls